H E generous and anxious Montgomery found his impetuous friend impatiently attending his arrival. The moment he saw him he enquired eagerly for Victorine. * Have you not brought her? when shall I see her? where have you lost her? and why are you so late? were questions articulated without waiting for an answer to either. For heaven s fake, Chesterville, said Montgomery, for heaven s fake be more calm and reasonable. You know best what reasons you have for wishing to keep your attachment to this young foreigner concealed from your father and your sister; if they are very forcible, is it possible you should not consider the probability there is of its being discovered if she comes higher? I did t I did wish indeed, replied Chesterville, I did with that my father might not know yet that...
