Not illustrated. 1845 Excerpt: . . . of Englands noble sons, that were we deprived of what we learn during the three first years of our lives, we should be the most ignorant beings on the face of the globe, is less extravagant in point of fact than in sound; and there had been no tinge of extravagance nor less of shrewdness in the remark, if, instead of three, he had specified the first seven or ten years of life. In those years, beyond question, are laid the foundations of the social and religious character which every man carries to the grave; and the firmness and fair proportions of the structure reared upon them, will correspond with their solidity and breadth. And when in varied language God commands the father to make known the truth unto his children--to teach the words that he commands diligently unto them--to talk of them when...
