And, independently of this objection, there is a great difficulty in understanding how a morbid process, supposed to be set up by an external nonspecific agent, could afterwards be communicated with perfect similarity by means of a specific agent of a different kind. If like effects betoken like causes, it must be granted that the matter which causes diphtheria in the later extension of an 2 Dr. Woodforde, however, has found diphtheria apparently favoured by thick growth of trees about a village, and disappearing when the trees were thinned. (See Sanitary Record, February, 1880.) epidemic is of the same kind as that which causes it in the first case. But in the later cases the morbific matter is something that has multiplied greatly in...
